3a. The radiation can be detected and measured in several ways. By use of a Geiger-Muller (GM) tube and counter. This electronically amplifies the ionising effect of the radiation and is used for very accurate measurements of radioactivity and it can detect a single radioactive event.

That all depends on what you define as "Radiation". You get some small amounts of Electromagnetic Radiation from all electronic devices. You don't get anything nasty like you used to out of the back of old unshielded CRT monitors (modern ones are shielded and don't emit very much at all).

We "feel" visible light, in the sense that we have cells that detect it and send the information to our brains for processing. But since the cells in question are different from the ones that detect infrared light, and since our brains process the two sorts of information differently, we use different terminology.
